IT'S NEVER TOO LATE TO FINISH HIGH SCHOOL

New CollegeBound Network Portal Assists Adults With Online High School Diplomas, GEDs, and More

Staten Island, NY, May 26, 2009 – You can't go to college without a high school diploma or equivalency, and it's increasingly difficult to launch a secure, profitable career without a college degree. Good news to the more than 18 million American adults who have yet to overcome the high school hurdle is that there are a variety of high school completion options for them to explore, including online diploma programs, flexible GED training programs, and more. Accordingly, The CollegeBound Network, a leader in providing education information and resources, today unveiled a "prequel" portal to its suite of higher education sites: High School Completion Programs.

Through its new High School Completion portal, The CollegeBound Network provides interactive areas that feature targeted resources for those in need of their secondary education credential. With access to The CollegeBound Network's robust directory, students can explore high school completion programs, online high school courses, and GED programs to find their fit. In addition, traditional-age students seeking an alternative to their local high school can discover a variety of online high schools available to meet their needs.

"For more than 20 years, The CollegeBound Network has touted the personal and professional benefits of higher education," says Luciano Rammairone, CEO of The CollegeBound Network. "But a staggering number of adults are ineligible for the benefits of a college education because they have not yet received their high school diploma or GED."

"With a high school diploma or GED in hand, a world of higher education and career opportunities presents itself," adds Rammairone. "The CollegeBound Network is dedicated to ensuring that learners of all ages can grab hold of every opportunity education affords."
